Paragraph One: Career

Web development is one of the few careers that could never be taken over by AI as it requires a creative look into an idea or a website that is original and created with time and soul. It is a true combination of both art and technology, which is why one of my career goals is to learn web development and create an actual website. I plan to learn or build skills in HTML, CSS, and JavaScript through school and online courses. I would like to apply for an internship in the future to get some real world, hands-on experience in the field, and explore the tools a lot of web developers use. I find web development interesting because I truly believe there is no end to the possibilities to making a website. It could also be my way of leaving a mark on the digital world, or at least a couple minutes in one person's life, making my life more memorable or at least change the world in some small insignificant way.

Conclusion

All in all, I do not know where the future will take me, as I do not think anyone does, but the thing that matters to me the most is that no matter where I end up I will work hard and honestly for that position. I hope you feel the same way and would like to thank you for reading this page. I kindly implore you to visit the rest of this site as rest assured, I will have worked very hard on it.

Paragraph 2: Personal Qualities

Some traits that I possess that make me suited for this career are my adaptability, my perseverance, and my good communication. My adaptability could help me stay on trend to the quick changes in the industry. Growing up I was an avid reader, and was able to make it through 200,000 word novels in mere days, but the library was too far for my family to frequently visit, so I had to learn what websites had the most books with the least amount of ads, and I had to find things to trade with others at school in return for borrowing their books. Another one of my valuable traits is my perseverance. I know I will never learn everything, or be constantly perfect at something, but I know that by not giving up I could be a valuable team member and become better than I used to be. I learned early on that I am bound to mess up or end up in a room full of people more experienced than me, but if I work hard there is nothing I can not learn or do. I also value my communication skills, which have come in handy for the numerous group projects I have done. I know how to find a compromise and speak my opinion in a respectful manner, while maintaining the friendship, partnership, or acquaintance with another person.

Paragraph 3: Skills and Achievements

One of my biggest accomplishments so far has been cross country. Not just the enjoyment of every race; the thrill of crossing the finish line feeling the pain and adrenaline in every inch of your body, but also simply attending practice everyday. Spending three hours six days a week doing brutal workouts in the sun after an exhausting day at school is truly one of the most tiresome tasks a person can do. Having to learn to manage my time because not only are hours taken off my day by practice, but by the time I arrive home every muscle in my body feels like collapsing from exhaustion; so I have barely any time to do my homework and everyday tasks. One life experience that taught me valuable abilities was taking biology over the summer. I learned the importance of responsibility and hard work. One of the main challenges I faced was that I had three weeks less than every other freshman taking the course, as my family was going on a trip at the end of summer. I did not have anyone there to give me deadlines on each of the assignments so I had no idea if I was ahead or behind. I had to plan ahead not only to be able to meet my deadline but to also calculate different types of assignments with a different amount of time based on difficulty level, forcing me to evaluate my skills realistically and having to be honest in my flaws. I also lost the ability to complain to anyone about the workload as I had fully put it on myself, forcing me to have to take responsibility for my actions; I chose to take a time consuming course over the summer, so if I'm struggling it was my choice to struggle.
